First Axis
Memory, History and Their Social, Cultural, and Political Implications Today, Seventy Years After the War of National Liberation

This axis will focus on the process of ‘deconstructing’ the intellectual structures of the colonial institution and its archives, in order to renew the knowledge linked to their object of study, while at the same time deepening our understanding of society relationship with its past (fields of research in the anthropology of memory), with its founding events and with its actors after seventy years of the Revolution. The social frameworks of Algerian memory today will be addressed, as will the generational dimension of discourses on national memory (forms of generational appropriation of the national narrative). It will also look at local memories, which represent one of the avenues for a constructive and critical reading based on new (field) studies that are also interested in analysing the content of oral memories, the margins and marginalised, feminine voices, the ‘revolutionary’ elite, religious, educational and cultural memory during the colonial period, as well as the narratives of ordinary people.

Second Axis

Citizenship, New Elites and the Question of Recognition

This axis focuses on citizenship, its practices, discourses and representations in society (H. Remaoun, 2012). From this perspective, we will also be looking at the renewal of research on the elements that frame public spaces in Algeria, in the light of the digital and media transformations that characterise virtual means of communication. How is the system of re-acknowledging rights and duties in society shaped socially? How is the issue of re-cognition represented socially? How is it represented in the public arena (for example, in the case of associative activity)? Who are the new elites in Algeria (intellectual, political, cultural, religious, etc.) and what are their references today? Who are the ‘influencers’ who discuss issues of public interest and what are the contents of their products, their points of reference and their educational backgrounds? These are just a few of the avenues that could be explored in order to make a further contribution to the approach to citizenship taken by ‘ordinary people’.

Third Axis

Questions of the Social Imaginery, Cultural Heritage, Language and Translation : A Generational Approach

This axis will address the updating of analyses of the meanings of the social imaginary today, as well as the manifestation of its cultural practices, which play a structuring role in the renewal of knowledge of intangible cultural heritage (challenges of collection and classification, new actors, modes of transmission, practical knowledge, etc.). The questioning of languages and new forms of popular expression such as: popular literature, songs, folk tales, and intellectual expression, new authors and their novels, new artists in the fields of painting and theatre and their cultural practices and audiences. A revisiting of knowledge concerning the cultural domain in Algeria, updating field data, new actors, their languages, symbolic systems, cultural practices and the mechanisms of their transmission, translation and communication.

Fourth Axis

Socialisation Institutions: Knowledge Production and Training Quality Challenges

This axis attempts to analyse the changes in socialisation institutions and their generational challenges in the light of public policies (family, youth, the elderly, children, people with special needs, women, etc.). Previous studies have revealed that ‘the family in Algeria’ is undergoing accelerated changes linked to transformations in its demographic composition and the conditions of its actors (singlehood, divorce, ageing, childhood, youth, etc.). In addition, training institutions (schools, universities, vocational training centres) are also undergoing changes reflected in their institutional programmes (F. Dubet, 2002). The mission of these institutions is to meet the challenge of quality and social success. The aim of the axis is to update the knowledge on family and analyse its relationship with school, university and other training/socialisation institutions. This involves understanding the objective indicators that allow us to determine, among others, the decline in the success rate, school dropout, feminisation of school success, higher education massification and feminisation, as well as the professional future of graduates, low employability of graduates and the difficulties in building the youth future projects.

Fifth Axis
Territories, Urban Spaces and Migration
Approaches to Debating Quality of Life

This axis involves analysing the impact of social transformations and public policies and their local actors on populated areas and forms of ownership of living spaces and quality of life. The aim is to question urban policies in towns and cities, their expansion and governance and to update our knowledge of the rural world, its social and cultural institutions and its farming activities. Who are the farmers in Algeria today? What has become of them after more than 60 years of independence? Particular attention will be paid to analyse the populated areas of the Algeria South and their urban models and cultural practices. Housing, migration, geographical mobility, etc., are important research themes, which will enable us to update our knowledge of the social question, according to national and regional indicators, and to grasp the significance of the various (State) support policies and their impact. One of the challenges facing public policy in the transformation of the city is 'The State and the overflow and growth of social demand'.

Sixth Axis

Emergent Research in Social Sciences and Humanities Themes and Training Issues

For more than three decades, the CRASC has attached great importance to emergent research, integrating young researchers into various institutional research projects in order to ensure that they receive proper training. It has also worked on promoting some of their production by assisting them in the publication of their first research papers or by offering them training opportunities at national and international conferences. These meetings, which often take the form of methodological workshops, provide doctoral students with an opportunity to present the progress of their work.

Since its first issue in 1997, the Insaniyat Journal has made a significant contribution to promoting the results of young researchers, by introducing the "Position Paper" section, which is mainly dedicated to the publication of emerging research. It has also published two double issues: "First Research 1", issue 14-15, 2001 including 27 articles and "First Research 2", issue 29-30, 2005 including 27 articles in various fields of social and cultural anthropology. In terms of training, the Centre scientific partnership with a number of Algerian universities has led to the foundation of the Doctoral School of Anthropology. In the context of its cooperation with the Council for the Development of Social Science Research in Africa (CODESRIA-Dakar), the CRASC has also been involved in international training, organising the Methodological Workshops in North Africa in Oran, as well as the Academic Writing Workshops in collaboration with the Centre for Maghreb Studies in Algeria (CEMA) and the Research Methodology Workshops with the Institute for Research on the Contemporary Maghreb (IRMC) in Tunis. The first conference on Emergent Research in the Maghreb provided an opportunity to present high-quality research experiences (outputs, approaches and supervision conditions). It also gave participants the possibility to describe the development of their work in terms of the subjects studied and the theoretical approaches adopted, in relation to their involvement in research institutions (laboratories, research centres, research teams, etc.). In addition, the first edition of the conference contributed to a debate on the "complex relationship" between the quality of doctoral training and the work of young researchers, highlighting the cases of "isolation" encountered by doctoral students in social sciences and humanities during the preparation of their theses and the "weak link" that bounds this research with the institutional fabric of research. This weakness takes the form of a lack of prior knowledge and a "lack" of specificity in structuring research themes, which seem to be limited in terms of promotion, dissemination and visibility of results in a context marked by generational particularities in terms of supervision.
